Branch campuses, off-campus sites, centers, and all other instructional sites located geographically apart and independent of the institution's main campus are increasingly crucial to higher education in today's landscape. They serve as an opportunity to extend the imprint of the institution into local communities and regions. Yet, institutions face significant risks with an Out-of-Sight, Out-of-Mind approach leading to the struggle of off-campus sites. Accreditation standards must document and ensure the adequacy of the institution's planning, evaluation, support, and financial resources; and stability to support instruction for each individual instructional site, regardless of the geographic location. In today's environment, it is essential that the main campus administration adequately understand and value the importance of addressing student success and support services at off-campus sites. Key administrators overseeing off-campus locations must collaborate and engage with a diverse group of other institutional peer stakeholders, ensuring the highest quality and integrity for all students.
